| Definition                                    | The share of commodity items (in %) of the smallest and developing countries to which zero tariffs are applied in Chapter 01-97 of the Harmonized System (HS).                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| Basic concepts:                               | Tariff Line or National Tariff Lines (NTL): National tariff line codes refer to classification codes applied to goods by individual countries that are longer than the six-digit level of the Harmonized System. A country could freely make national differences in tariffs or for any other purpose. The national tariff codes are based on the HS system, but they are longer than six digits. For example, the six-digit HS code 010120 refers to Donkeys, Mullahs and mules living, whereas the US National Tariff Code 010120.10 refers to live purebred breeding donkeys, 010120.20 refers to live donkeys other than purebred breeding donkeys, and 010120.30 refers to mullahs and mules imported for malevolent slaughter.                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| Justification and interpretation              | The calculation of this indicator allows us to observe how many products of developing countries and least developed countries will have free access to the markets of developed countries. In comparison with tariff rates applied to other countries, this indicator is allowed to assess the extent to which special and differentiated treatment was provided for import tariffs. The evolution of this indicator will take place on the basis of progress in phasing out tariff rates for goods coming from developing countries and called developed countries. Tariffs are customs duties on imports of goods levied either on the basis of value (as a percentage of value) or on a specific basis (for example, USD 7 per 100 kg). Tariffs can be used to create a price advantage for similar locally produced goods and to increase government revenue. Tariffs are not taken into account by the anti-trade and tax measures. |

| Comments and restrictions:                                           | When considering this indicator, the following caveats should be taken into account: There are no exact values for special and differential treatment for developing countries, so calculations are limited only to tariffs. They are an unnecessary part of trade restriction factors, especially when considering exports from developing or least developed countries under a non-reciprocal preferential treatment that sets eligibility criteria. The full system of country development preferences is used for the calculation, but the preferential treatment may not be fully utilized by developing country exporters for various reasons, such as, for example, the ability of some exporters to meet the selection criteria (i.e. comply with the law of origin). The list contains accurate statistical information on the extent of the actual use of each of these preferences, suggesting that they are fully utilized. The duty-free trade regime is an indicator of market access, but it is not always synonymous with a single regime for beneficiary countries, the first set of tariffs for Countries enjoying the highest welfare status (MFN) has already reached zero or is close to zero, especially for fuels and minerals. International agreements on IT products also provide for duty-free handling of components and equipment used for pulp production. |

| Data availability and gaps:                                          | The main information used to calculate the 10.a.1 indicators is data on import tariffs. Information on import tariffs can be obtained by contacting National Statistical Offices, postal representations of countries to the United Nations, regional organizations or customs coordination centers, ministries responsible for customs (Ministry of Economy / Finance and relevant revenue authorities) or, alternatively, the Ministry of Commerce. Tariff data for calculating this indicator is extracted from the MTK database (MAcMap) - http://www.macmap.org / - WTO (IDB) - http://tao.wto.org - and UNCTAD (TRAINS). Import tariff data included in the ITC database (MAcMap) is collected through direct contact with the responsible person at the coordination centers in national agencies or regional organizations (in the case of customs unions or regional economic communities). If possible, the data is uploaded by international or regional official websites. In some cases, the data is purchased from a private company. Import tariff data included in the WTO database                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
